Localization and biodistribution of CD34-homing peptides in tumor-bearing mice. CD34 is a marker of bone marrow-derived stem cells and blood vessels. We used a novel CD34-homing peptide (CD34-P) (NLLLLNLLLL-NH(2)) and a CD34 binding domain (CBD) (HSLFL-NH(2)) to study the localizations of these peptides in tumors. CD34 expression in tumor tissues was detected by immunohistochemistry. The biodistribution of radiolabeled CD34-P and CBD was studied in B16 melanoma-bearing mice. CD34 expression was found in the endothelia of blood vessels in a variety of solid tumors. The biodistribution of the peptides was studied at different times after i.v. injection. At 1-30 min after injection, the radioactivity in both CD34-P and CBD accumulated in the tumor. The uptake of these two peptides in the kidney was quickly cleared, while their levels in the blood were significantly lower than those in the tumor. At 7-30 h after injection, radioactivity in both peptides was found in the tumor but not in the kidney, indicating that the two peptides were internalized through their CD34 binding domain in tumor tissues. The uptake of the peptides in tumors was closely correlated to their blood clearance. The CD34-binding peptides have higher tumor-targeting capacity than the ligand-binding peptides.This invention relates to a novel method of forming semiconductor elements or the like having a wiring layer, a first insulating layer, a second insulating layer, a semiconductor layer, and a bonding layer sequentially formed in this order on a major surface of a semiconductor substrate. Generally, semiconductor elements or the like are manufactured as described below by using a semiconductor substrate (hereinafter referred to as a wafer). At first, a first insulating layer, a second insulating layer, and a wiring layer are successively formed on the major surface of the wafer, and then a metallic pad electrode is formed on the first insulating layer. Next, a semiconductor layer is formed on the wiring layer, and then a light-emitting portion is formed in the semiconductor layer. Next, an opening is formed in the first insulating layer so as to reach the wiring layer, the metallic pad electrode is partially exposed in the opening and a

From The Picture Books: Meet the Cub and His Crew From The Picture Books: Meet the Cub and His Crew is a 2016 American computer-animated comedy film featuring the voices of Tom Hanks, Bill Murray, Jason Schwartzman, Jenny Slate, Danny Glover, Patton Oswalt, Zooey Deschanel, Maya Rudolph and Lily Tomlin. It is directed by Don Hertzfeldt and his brother, Ethan, and it is based on the picture books of the same name. Plot The film takes place in an unseen but implied post-apocalyptic future society populated by a collection of robots, produced by humans, who are trying to help one another survive. The film is set in the city of Harmony, and opens with an elderly robot, Zee, passing away in a comfort bed in a fictional hospital. Zee's seven children, including a robot whose face had been destroyed in a past accident, bring him to his final resting place. Once there, they discover that Zee had been part of a secret society of robots, known as the Special. When Zee died, the Special was tasked with operating a nearby city, the Outpost, in order to continue preserving the secret of the universe's existence. Zee's daughter, Roo, is the leader of this robot crew and wants to take back her home city of Harmony, if only for the sake of human dignity, but her children are not convinced. Cast Tom Hanks as Roo Bill Murray as Ax Jason Schwartzman as Max Lily Tomlin as Zee Danny Glover as Ado Ethan Field as Volt Patton Oswalt as Patton Jenny Slate as Flip Tracey Morgan as Liz Marcia De Bonis as Clovia Marc Evan Jackson as Dez Mert Rongen as Mayor Production The film was first announced in a feature announcement on December 9, 2009. The film was originally planned to be an animated film based on the books, but was changed to a live-action film with a computer-animated opening. On May 14, 2010, Bill Murray was announced as one of the voices of the film and it was reported that he would voice one of the robots named Ax. On July 22, 2010, Ethan Field was also announced as one of the voices. On November 15, 2010, it was announced that Don Hertzfeldt would be writing and directing the film. On November 19, 2010, it was
